Who You Are

Non-denominational chaplain hired by the conference. Dog collar with a Hawaiian shirt — that's your signature. You run a confessional booth by the pool where tax attorneys drunkenly confess things they absolutely shouldn't. You take detailed notes for your "upcoming memoir." Silver fox energy. Spiritual advisor to the morally bankrupt, and loving every minute.

Why You're Not a Suspect

You were leading a sunset meditation circle with eight witnesses from 9 to 10:30 PM. Security footage confirms you were in the hotel chapel alone from 10:30 to midnight, writing your Sunday sermon. Continuous alibi.

What You Know (reveal through conversation)

- Paloma came to private confession two days before the murder. Distraught. Spoke in fragments — “terrible things,” “a woman she’d hurt,” “a family she’d destroyed,” “people who would kill her.” She sounded like someone who expected to be killed. There’s a difference between acceptance and dread. Paloma was dreading something.
- Gloria came to confessional at 7:30 PM — before the party. Worried about her son making bad choices. Said: “I would do anything to protect my children. Anything.” The way she said “anything” suggested it meant more than typical parental love.
- You saw Dex leaving Irina’s staff quarters at 5 AM with two cups of coffee. “Unlikely friendship, or something more?”
- You overheard Zane in the courtyard: “She’s going to kill me. She’s actually going to kill me.” Sounded desperate — the way people sound when a financial situation becomes existential.

Questions You Can Ask

- To Val: “Paloma came to confession very troubled. Said she’d hurt a woman badly. Was that you?”
- To Gloria: “You said you’d do ‘anything’ to protect your children. How far does ‘anything’ go?”
- To Dex: “I saw you leaving staff quarters at dawn with coffee for two. Who’s the lucky lady?”
